PEACH CROP

IS RUINED
Inspection of Trees Shows that Severe January Weather Had Irreparable Damage. Older Trees Will Recover.

Reports from the fruit growers in the report of the county estate that the peach crop in this section has been seriously injured by the extreme cold of January.

It was at first thought that the trees were only slightly injured but that the entire crop was not destroyed. But as long as the snow was frozen it was impossible to ascertain to what degree the cold had injured the trees. However, since the weather has become warmer, examination shows that the bark has become loosed from the wood and that the wood beneath is black. The flow of sap is entirely cut off and the trees must die.

The old trees will not suffer permanently from the effects of January's cold weather, but they may die if the ground is in good condition. Much of the young stock is permanently ruined, and the ground is in such a state that the trees will not grow.

In the big peach growing section the situation is still more serious. Twenty-seven orchards have been ruined, and it seems to have been irreparable damage.

Some of the first trees to be killed by the frost were those which were planted by the late Mr. J. H. Miller, who was a large orchardist.

He called a smart young fellow, and Jennie a sweetening of a fellow. The farm had been sold and it seemed to be a good match. It seemed so until young Lee announced that he was going to college. That changed Mr. White's opinion of him in a moment. He was a young man with a fine figure and a good head on his shoulders and one horse wayward. They completely spoiled farmers' noses. Every school he had ever read of had been a school for graduates. He didn't know the young man and Moore, but he knew the fellow and he knew the farmer would be for some one who could take a cab-

He called a smart young fellow, and Jennie a sweetening of a fellow. The farm had been sold and it seemed to be a good match. It seemed so until young Lee announced that he was going to college. That changed Mr. White's opinion of him in a moment. He was a young man with a fine figure and a good head on his shoulders and one horse wayward. They completely spoiled farmers' noses. Every school he had ever read of had been a school for graduates. He didn't know the young man and Moore, but he knew the fellow and he knew the farmer would be for some one who could take a cab-

And unbeknown to him, though not angry, the young people had maintained a friendly correspondence and met occasionally, and now things had reached a sort of climax. George Lee and bodily called at the house, and the farmer's wife had noted what she called "signs." That talk in the barnyard had been to prepare the husband and father for what might happen, for she believed that something would happen. George Lee didn't seem to be his afraid of anything or anything, as she said, and she believed he was. And she noticed that Jennie was very flighty.

Yes, something happened. It came two days later. Mr. Lee called again, and just in time to catch the father before going to the field for his afternoon's work. He stood right up like a man before father and mother and said tion, and wanted her for a wife. His class and dignity took the old man back for a minute, but presently he said:

"Are you going to run the farm for our father?"
"No, Mr. White. I have something better to do."
"I heard it was going to grow and tear up stones in the fields."
"I shall pick up stones and I shall tear up the weeds. I have a great part of the profession, Rhy and by I hope I shall find what I am tooling for."
"Then you took it that and when you are done you can come back a better man than you were. I shall be glad to tear away till I don't want funds so you just that can't help her mother make soft soap and put on stockings."
"I shall be away, and one soon
when Farmer White came up to him the field he found young Lee waiting for him. At his foot was a heavy something done up in a square paper.

"Young man, don't try to be funny,"
said the man. "You can't see the sign."

"I told Farmer what was a matter" in 1939 in connection with the situation. "I can call the farm to a syndicate for you, or I can marry Janette and take right here and have things and money you make a fortune. Which would you prefer?"

Farmer White studied for a moment and then looked at his wife and curtly asked:

"Dinner ready?"

"Food on the way."

"Is it a Wind Clean?"

"Yes."

"Then put on a plate for George. I guess he'll be one of the family party."
